Thompson, assigned to the Kobe quartermaster depot, allegedly drove a tractor head-on toward Cpl. Robert S. Taylor, 20, of the 24th infantry regiment, who was on duty as a guard at the pier with a Japanese guard. Taylor and the Japanese guard said Thompson first approached them in a small low tractor and left the vehicle after being challenged. He was escorted to the sentry box. While the guard telephoned authorities, Thompson broke away, leaped into the tractor and started head-on toward the two guards. Taylor fired almost pointblank the bullet striking Thompson in the abdomen. Thompson was pronounced dead upon arrival at the eighth station hospital. Thompson is survived by his mother, Mrs. Veva Thompson of Route one, Hammond, La.

JAMES CAGNEY gives a strong arm treatment to VIRGINIA MAYO in this scene from Warner Bros. "WHITE HEAT."

The CAMEO

By Virginia Teale Copyright, 1949, NEA SERVICE, INC.

The Story: Hagar Blair seeking to buy valuables came from the East. Martin Falter, goes to his home and finds him murdered. Hagar previously had sensed something wrong when she found the cameo's box, open and empty, in her car after it had been shown to her with the cameo inside by Arnold Pfeffer, who was commissioned by Falter to sell it. Hagar searches the dead man's home and finds no cameo. Meanwhile, Stephanie Smith, who works for Hagar, arrives in a taxi. They do not report the murder to police, but go to Hagar's home, where they both live. There in Hagar's cameo collection, the missing camellian that seems to be connected with Falter's murder.

Crouched in a thick growth of jasmine, exactly the right height and thickness to conceal a small, slender person like herself, Arnold Pfeffer looked through a window, opened a few inches, and saw Stephanie Smith talking to Hagar Blair. Stephanie had the cameo in her hands. "Isn't it lovely, Hagar? You can't imagine what it means to have it in my hands after all these years." Arnold saw Hagar plump down on the bed opposite Stephanie and say: "Hold on, girl. The cameo's not really yours yet, you know. We can't play fingers-keepers when there's just been a murder because of that brooch. Or, at least, we're assuming that's why somebody stuck a knife into Falter."

Arnold stiffened. So they knew about Martin! "Another thing," Hagar continued. "What's the story on this cameo? As far as you're concerned, you can't let a Crusader holding the Holy Grail. I've got to know whether to aid and abet you or turn the thing over to the police." She brooded. "Have in, anywhere, I guess."

Arnold shuddered. What would the police find out? Then Stephanie began to talk. "You can't Hagar!" Hagar shrugged. "It's evidence in a murder case, I guess." "But you want it too! You can't give it up." "Oh, yes I can. Do you think I want Chief Peters to jug me for complicity? We're already suspects — or will be, anyway, by tomorrow morning. But I think this is a good time for you to give me the story on the cameo. Your story that is."

Stephanie spoke: "Neil O'Neill is my aunt." Arnold choked back an involuntary gasp.

The girl's eyes were lowered to the cameo. "She doesn't know it, of course, she hasn't seen me since I was a little girl. I despise Nellie, even if she is my mother's sister. She stole this cameo from my mother. My mother was dying then. She lived only a few days after Nellie left us."

Arnold forgot the penetrating salt air. He moved dangerously close to the window to hear Hagar's words. "How did you know she was here in this little corner of the country?"

"I saw her picture in the paper when she married Tom O'Neill. There was a big story about it, being his fifth marriage. It told all about how much money his other marriages had cost him in settlements and alimony. And the article called Nellie 'the blond Russian dancer.'"

"I think I remember seeing it. She was a ballerina, wasn't she?" Stephanie gave a short bitter laugh. "A ballerina! One must have a suit to be a ballerina! My mother was the ballerina. My mother was dancing the ballet in Moscow when she was only nine years old."

Hagar stared at the girl. "This is the most fantastic story I've ever heard."

"My mother showed me that it was a locket. It contains a picture of her and of my father."

Let me see."

Stephanie looked troubled. "I don't know how to open it. My mother used to open it and show me the pictures. You press some thing and the cameo springs away from the frame. I think I can learn how it opens if only I can keep the cameo long enough."

Stephanie spoke again, beseechingly: "Do you understand, Hagar? It gives me an identity. A family!"

Arnold ducked as Hagar stood abruptly and faced the window. "What happened to your father?" "Mother received word that he was killed in Russia during the revolution. He was trying to escape and come to her. He was captured and shot."

"He must have been on the losing side. Did he have a title?" "I don't know. But sometimes men used to tease me when I was naughty and say that little countesses didn't behave that way."

"Great graven gods! You don't suppose you're a countess?" Stephanie smiled. "I don't suppose so. I've always thought of myself as an orphan who started making her own way in the world by working in a department store in Chicago."

"She turned away again and perched on the foot of the bed. "Can you prove the cameo's yours?"

"No."

"Then how do you intend to get it away from Nell?"

"She'll sell it. We know that."

"Wonder how she happened to let Falter get hold of it?" Hagar was speculating.

"She must have had a question of her ownership. She can claim it — if she can find it. But, here's something we've almost lost sight of: Who put it in my collection cabinet. And why?"

"He there's no question of her ownership. She can claim it — if she can find it. But, here's something we've almost lost sight of: Who put it in my collection cabinet. And why?"

Fair Enough

New York, Nov. 11 — With the publication of the second volume of the memories of Eleanor the Great, the public, posterity and history are beginning to catch shy intimations from devolves upon the slanted foot rears in New York at to the marital relationship between the couple who set a certain moral and spiritual example for their own children and for a whole generation of Americans. There may be more and more candid admissions as time goes on, admissions in the form of assumptions as though it had been an understood fact that these two were estranged, but believe we actually have news here.

In the Sunday book review of the New York Times, Elizabeth Janeway, described as the author of a wartime novel about Washington and other books, wrote: "She had built her life on the fact that it was not the same, not a life lived in common."

Such delicacy may be appropriate to a mood of political adjustment, but it is not forthright and I belong to a school which abhors intimations. There is a suggestion here that the Roosevelts were at least there had been external indications of a split. The wife calculated absence most of the time from a man who was paralyzed from the waist down. I have heard pseudo-intellectuals try to find an unconscious, but willingly, even gladly, live apart from a stricken husband, but I have never been convinced. This reviewer gives me to suspect that she knows whereof she writes and not to be deceived.

Now to go back a way. I observe that in her little book, "Memories," published in 1946, Olive Clapper, the widow of a truly heroic but fulfilled idealist, Raymond Clapper, was much more to the point.

Olive, too, for some reason unfathomable to me, for she is a wise girl who never showed symptoms of new deal madness when she was young, is rapturous over Eleanor and Great. I find it hard to believe that she sincerely believes such tripe, but she writes that the rab's calculated exploitation of her status to develop a political machine in the bureaucracy "called down on her head angry outbursts of those who have forgotten the weak and lonely and the quality of mercy."

However, she who fought the great political and divorce case, I find it hard to believe that she sincerely believes such tripe, but she writes that the rab's calculated exploitation of her status to develop a political machine in the bureaucracy "called down on her head angry outbursts of those who have forgotten the weak and lonely and the quality of mercy."

I had overlooked until recently a passage in Olive's book which I now read in the light of the ray through a widening canon. "Like other married couples," Franklin and Eleanor had their days of love affairs, she said. "Whether that man was a Catholic, a Jew, a Protestant, or what his origin and color were."

"That grave—the grave of the unknown soldier—symbolizes our faith in the future," she said. "Mr. Truman indicated that passage of civil rights legislation might do much to spike criticism of the United States by 'our enemies' abroad."

The last sentence of Olive's quote about the volunteers, I think, you have the idea which enables the Roosevelt child to review without blinking the martial record of four of the five Roosevelt children whose adventures are calmly explained in the book.

Almost from the hour of his first inauguration, Roosevelt's wife sped from, not to the side of an afflicted spouse and a rough calculation of the evidence of her newspaper clippings indicates that she was absent from the White House 75 per cent of the time from September, 1942, to September, 1943. During this year, travel was restricted and automobile tires and fuel for cars and planes were severely rationed to those whom Olive, and other of the Club, so thoughtfully, if truthfully, regard as "forgotten" human beings.

Temperatures Favor Grid Spectators

By The Associated Press

Spectators had the weather on their side today at most of the football games.

Temperatures were around normal to well above seasonal marks over virtually the entire nation. Over the eastern half of the country, the weather was mild with skies mostly clear.

There were some scattered showers in the great plains area, mostly from Iowa southward into Texas and the Eastern Dakotas into most of the Great Lakes region but passage of civil rights legislation, the weather was mild with skies mostly clear.

The only rain in the West was reported in Western Washington and Northeastern Oregon.

Eldest Roosevelt to Seek Calif. Governorship

Los Angeles, Nov. 11 — (AP)—James Roosevelt, F.D.R.'s oldest son, is expected to announce his intentions for the governorship of California next Tuesday.

He scheduled a press conference for the afternoon and a radio broadcast that night. Police insiders say the passage of civil rights legislation, the weather was mild with skies mostly clear.

His probable major opponent in the 1950 Democratic primary, George Luecke, Truman campaign manager in this state last year.

Washington, Nov. 11 — (AP)—President Truman vigorously renewed his call for passage of civil rights laws today, saying they are needed to overcome "discrimination and injustice."

In view of the fundamental faith of this country and the clear language of the constitution, I do not see how we can do otherwise than adopt such legislation," Mr. Truman declared in an Armistice Day speech prepared for a meeting of the national conference of Christians and Jews.

The President noted that just a few hours before he had laid a wreath on the grave of the unknown soldier.

No American knows and no real American cares," he said, "whether that man was a Catholic, a Jew, a Protestant, or what his origin and color were."

"That grave—the grave of the unknown soldier—symbolizes our faith in the future," she said. "Mr. Truman indicated that passage of civil rights legislation might do much to spike criticism of the United States by 'our enemies' abroad."

One of Eleanor's trips took her in a wide sortie about the South Pacific, but eventually, and inevitably, to Guadalcanal where her protégé, Joe Lash, was stationed in the army. The public paid for this campaign although she did make a little pretense that she was going on some semiprobable business and would give the Red Cross the receipts from her column during that time. The Red Cross hardly added to give any information. The public treasury of the United States was bled of the cost of this sentimental journey and though she did concede the principle that a restoration should be made, a mere token gift to the Red Cross only emphasized the wrong.

Pat Robinson, of the International at News, present then in Guadalcanal, reported that "about 31 of 32 planes" were sent to escort Mrs. Roosevelt's plane, an incredible expense to prosperity and an ineluctable hazard to the fliers and other fighting men reliant on their efforts in legitimate war.

As she progressed through a hospital, chatting with wounded and sick men, Pat followed close behind and asked one patient his impression of the honor of seeing the President's wife.

"I'd rather see my own," he replied. "An appropriate remark to the emotional ballyhoo published in the Herald Tribune under the name of Lewis Gannett, who is cited 14 times in the reports of the committee on un-American activities."
